Djirruwang Program offers pathway to help community tackle mental illness.

Guiding Light

A BORIGINAL MENTAL HEALTH TRAINEE KRISTEN ELLA IS PASSIONATE ABOUT HELPING HER PEOPLE AND CHARLES STURT UNIVERSITY'S (CSU) DJIRRUWANG PROGRAM IN WAGGA NSW IS HELPING HER ACHIEVE HER GOALS.

Kisten is undertaking a Health Science (Meritäl Health) degree and is interring with Byde Community Meritäl Health Centre in Sydney as part of her degree through CSU.

The Djirruwang Program is specifically designed for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people to gain high quality knowledge, skills and attitudes in the field of mental health. This is achieved by building on students' knowledge and combining mental health theory with dinical practice.

"The Djinuwang Program provides the opportunity for Aboriginal people to help close the gap for our people,"Kristen says.

"As we know there is a life expectancy gap of around 20 years, the aim of the program is to educate and employ Aborginal people in the Government sector so we can help our people receive treatment and also to prevent any lines. Triotice in my work, as do other Aboriginal Health Workers that Aboriginal people are more likely to visit a health care centre where an Aboriginal person is present." Kirsten's experience is that her people will also open up more and generally feel more comfortable with Aboriginal Health Workers. She first became intervened in the week of mental health from her dad who is an Aborigmal Duag and Alcohol worker.

"My diad found the program, as I was going to study social work, however this program is Aboriginal specific and you end up with a Health Science degree," the says

The course is a matture of practical and theoretical learning over three years. Readents attend CRUFock times a year and during the year submit assignments when they are not in the workplace doing the ion the job component of the degree.

This mix suts Kristen. Tim more of a practical learner and I like to physically do something and not just read about it," she says. Kinsten decided to undertake her practical training at Ryde Community Mental Health Centre for two reasons. The centre has a good reputation within the mental health care industry, and it's also close to Kristen's home on the Central Coast of NSW. "I work in an acute team so that when an Aborginal client water so the meter an Aborginal client water in will begin liaising with them and assessing their mental state. I don't care manage alone but co-care manage, and I also undertake counselling of clients, "she says. T find a lot of merital health problems in our people item from prejudice and roots in their early lives and they carry that negativity. They still have their pride in outure, but some of the stories thave heard are bruit. And there's also the transgenerational traums.

There is also drugs and alcohol involved as well, in almost 100 per cent of cases.

The culture is so significant and people forget we are the First Australians and three is alot of history there... and so many issues with Aboriginal health and choone disease. Aboriginal people need to help other Aboriginal people."

Kirsten's passion for working in mental health to help her people has got her through the toughtimes during her degree when study and work have been hard going.

Tris not always been easy – yourneed time management and you also need to take time out for yourself but I have a passion to work in Aboriginal mental health," she says.

She's in the third year of her degree but hopes to continue to study after she's finished.

T want to get a psychology degree which will involve two and a half years parttime study. My long-term goals are to work in a community in the outback and also to work with Aborginal people with mental health problems in just because they need that support's the says.

Kirsten urges young Aboriginal people to take a look at the Djiruwang Program. "Check it out - it's something you could be interested in.

"There are 15 third year students in the Djirruwang Program from across Australia and I want to adknowledge their success in completing a degree to help our people."
